

Aarushi Shrivastav

Aarushi Shrivastav is a recent law graduate from the University of Exeter. Her work focuses on the intersection of trade and sustainability, with particular interest in how developing countries enforce WTO agreements. She completed a dissertation on the WTO Agreement on Fisheries Subsidies, critically analysing its implications for enforcement disparities in the Global South. Having lived in both India and the UK, Aarushi brings a cross-cultural perspective to questions of trade, justice, and global equity. She is passionate about amplifying youth voices and strengthening public understanding of trade's role in sustainable development.

Outside formal research, Aarushi creates accessible spaces for dialogue - especially around how trade rules affect artisanal workers and small-scale producers, whose voices are often excluded from global policy conversations. She believes that listening across differences is essential to trade diplomacy and hopes to use this platform to build bridges between institutions and everyday people.
